We will be in Memphis Oct. 5 and depart on the 12th. I think Amy may be trying to set up a dinner. Whatever, I hope we can talk some policy and politics. Nothing is simple is it!

Thanks for the Rod Rosenstein article. You know he and Hick worked together on the Whitewater team.

Well, a spate of homicides over a weekend is not good, but major violent crime is still down compared to last year (in all four major categories). The Beale street stabbing is a reflection on the need to get a better handle on things there late at night. (It does not need to be a hang out where people get into fights.) I think they made a mistake eliminating a cover charge for late night entry onto Beale.

Yes, the Focused Deterrence effort started by Amy is quite similar to Savannah's effort. We tried the public health approach with "interrupters" but with limited success.

I'm concern that the new county mayor does not grasp what we are trying to do. Hoping to educate him and get him on board, but it will be difficult.

Does this mean you are in Memphis October 5-12?

Bill-I saw the recent spate of homicides that is putting a damper on some of your good news and the video of the Beale Street stabbing featuring a bunch of people who appear to be sitting on a powder keg.

The new county mayor seems not to be a fan of the police department. I'm wondering to what degree he is going to support your effort. I attach two articles. I seem to recall you all have been using a program like Savannah's. The public health approach should hold promise, although the article speaks to his application in a very different culture and ignores the apparent recent failures in Chicago. I do think there is much to be gained by a public health approach, but only if it is done in coordination with law enforcement and prosecutors.

My view has always been there are just not enough public health resources and it must be understood this is not an "either/or" situation. I hope the new county mayor and other officials can grasp this.

You are a brave man to take all this on. I wish I could help. I will be available for lunch or dinner October 5 to 12, so I hope I get a chance to provide at least some moral support. We leave for three weeks in Venice and Croatia this coming Sunday. I'll still be checking on you-
